Japan Opens Antitrust Inquiry Into Four Brewers Over Suspected Beer Price Cartel

The Fair Trade Commission inspected Asahi, Kirin, Sapporo and Suntory after reports of yearslong coordination on wholesale price increases.

Japan’s antitrust authorities are investigating whether four of the country’s biggest brewers coordinated wholesale beer price increases, opening a major competition case in one of the nation’s most visible consumer markets.

The Japan Fair Trade Commission carried out compulsory inspections on October 7 at Asahi Breweries, Kirin Brewery, Sapporo Breweries and Suntory, according to Japanese media reports published the following day. The companies are suspected of discussing in advance the size and timing of price increases for beer and related products shipped to wholesalers, an arrangement that, if proven, could amount to a cartel under Japan’s antimonopoly law.

TV Asahi reported on October 8 that investigators believe the suspected coordination may have been going on for at least several years. The broadcaster, citing people familiar with the matter, said sales staff at the four companies were suspected of aligning prices and other terms and that the Fair Trade Commission was also looking into whether details of those discussions were shared with senior management.

Food industry publication Shokuhin Shimbun reported the same day that the commission had entered the four brewers on suspicion of forming a cartel to adjust beer prices and was conducting the investigation with possible criminal accusations in mind. The publication said the companies were suspected of coordinating the scale and timing of wholesale price hikes over a long period.

The case centers on wholesale pricing rather than retail shelf prices, and public reports so far have not provided figures for any alleged overcharges, consumer harm, or potential penalties. Authorities have also not publicly accused the companies of a proven violation. At this stage, the matter remains an investigation into suspected conduct.

The four companies dominate Japan’s beer market and play a central role in the pricing of alcoholic beverages sold through supermarkets, convenience stores, restaurants and bars. Any evidence that leading brewers aligned price increases would raise questions about how prices were formed across a sector that has already faced repeated cost pressures from raw materials, packaging, energy and logistics.

Shokuhin Shimbun said the four brewers implemented price increases at roughly the same times in October 2022, October 2023 and April 2025. The report did not say those increases themselves were unlawful, but cited them as part of the broader context in which investigators are examining whether company representatives discussed price revisions in advance.

The reports from October 8 followed company disclosures after the October 7 inspections. Kirin Holdings said in a statement dated October 7 that its beer unit had been inspected by the Fair Trade Commission and that it would fully cooperate with the inquiry. The statement confirmed the inspection but did not provide new details beyond that.

The other companies have also said they intend to cooperate fully with investigators. TV Asahi quoted Asahi Beer President Kazuo Matsuyama as saying the company was taking the matter seriously and would confirm the facts carefully while responding responsibly as a company.

The investigation puts new scrutiny on competition in Japan’s brewing industry at a time when many consumer goods producers have pushed through higher prices. Parallel price increases are common in markets facing the same cost pressures, but antitrust law draws a clear line between independent pricing decisions and coordination among competitors. The key issue for investigators is likely to be whether the brewers merely reacted to similar business conditions or whether they exchanged information and reached understandings on when and how much to raise prices.

Japanese authorities have not yet released a formal public account of the evidence they believe they have gathered. The available reporting indicates that the Fair Trade Commission used compulsory investigative powers, a step that suggests the agency views the allegations as serious. Under Japan’s antimonopoly law, cartels and other unreasonable restraints of trade can lead to administrative sanctions and, in some cases, criminal referrals.

The inquiry also has the potential to affect corporate governance inside the companies if investigators find that any discussions were not limited to frontline sales staff. TV Asahi reported that the commission appears to be examining whether the contents of the alleged talks were shared with management, an issue that could broaden the scope of responsibility if wrongdoing is established.

For now, the known facts remain limited. The inspections took place on October 7. Media reports on October 8 identified Asahi, Kirin, Sapporo and Suntory as the companies under investigation. The suspected conduct involves possible prior discussions on the scale and timing of wholesale beer price increases, and some reporting says those discussions may have continued for years. None of the public reports quantified damages or identified a specific amount of any alleged price inflation, and the companies have not admitted to any antitrust violation while saying they will cooperate with the authorities.
