EU-China Trade War Threatens $800 Million Wine Industry

Chinese Retaliation to EU Tariffs Could Devastate European Winemakers

Thursday, June 13, 2024

The European Commission's recent announcement to impose tariffs of up to 38.1% on electric vehicles imported from China marks a critical point in trade relations between the European Union (EU) and China, especially for the wine industry.

This move is a response to Brussels' conclusion that Chinese manufacturers benefit from government subsidies, giving them an unfair competitive edge. European Commission Vice-President Margaritis Schinas and Trade Commissioner Valdis Dombrovskis emphasized that the goal isn't to shut out Chinese electric cars from the European market but to ensure fair competition.

The proposed tariffs vary by manufacturer, affecting BYD with a 17.4% tariff, Geely with 20%, and SAIC with the maximum of 38.1%. Manufacturers that cooperated with the investigation will face a 21% tariff, while those that did not will be subject to the full 38.1%. Chinese companies have three days to respond to the Commission's calculations, which could lead to adjustments in the set rates.

This EU response has raised concerns among some member states, such as Germany and Sweden, fearing the repercussions of a trade war with China, particularly in food products where wine holds a significant position.

Interestingly, countries like France and Spain have welcomed the EU's move. France, a major wine exporter to China, and Spain, which exports wine and other food products, have expressed their support.

China, as reported earlier in May by Vinetur, has warned that if the EU imposes these tariffs, it will respond with similar measures on food products, including wine, dairy, and pork, as well as other European exports, including the aviation sector. This retaliation could jeopardize the wine trade between the EU and China, valued at $800 million. France, Italy, Spain, Germany, and Portugal are the main wine exporters from the EU to China, with France accounting for almost half of these exports.

Furthermore, China's retaliatory measures directly target European wine. Following the announcement of potential retaliatory tariffs in May, the Chinese government lifted its years-long ban on Australian wine, imposing an import tariff of 0%, compared to the usual 14%. This action suggests that China would not only replace European wine with Australian but also encourage importers to bring in Australian wine by removing all import barriers.

For the wine industry, this development is a significant concern. European wineries, particularly those in France, Spain, and Italy, have invested heavily in building their brands in the Chinese market. The sudden imposition of high tariffs could disrupt these efforts and lead to substantial financial losses.

Wineries are now faced with the challenge of navigating this turbulent trade landscape. Some may seek to diversify their markets, increasing exports to other regions to offset potential losses in China. Others might focus on enhancing their appeal to domestic consumers or exploring new opportunities in markets with emerging wine consumption trends.

The broader implications of this trade dispute extend beyond the wine industry. It serves as a stark reminder of the interconnectedness of global trade and how political decisions can have far-reaching economic consequences. As the situation unfolds, both European and Chinese businesses will need to adapt to the new trade realities, finding innovative ways to thrive despite the challenges.

In the meantime, wine enthusiasts and industry watchers alike will be keeping a close eye on developments, hoping for a resolution that allows for fair competition without compromising the rich cultural exchange that international wine trade represents. Whether through diplomatic negotiations or market adjustments, the goal remains to preserve the vibrant and diverse wine industry that so many have come to cherish.
