Domaine de la Romanée-Conti Wines Reach Record Prices Amid Global Demand

Scarcity, tradition and international interest drive soaring values for Burgundy’s most coveted bottles among collectors and investors

Tuesday, September 16, 2025

Domaine de la Romanée-Conti, often referred to as DRC, remains one of the most sought-after wine producers in the world. The estate, located in the Burgundy region of France, is known for its limited production and exceptional quality. Over the years, bottles from various vintages have consistently commanded high prices on the international market.

A recent review of ex-cellar prices for DRC wines from 1942 to 2016 shows a wide range in value depending on vintage and appellation. The 2016 La Tâche, for example, is listed at €5,454.17 before taxes. Other notable wines from the same year include Grands Echezeaux at €3,550 and Echezeaux at €3,400. Prices for earlier vintages can be even higher. The 2005 La Tâche is offered at €6,250, while the 1990 La Tâche reaches €7,454.17. The oldest bottle in this review, a 1942 La Tâche, stands out with a price of €11,995.83.

The estate produces several grand cru wines under different appellations. These include La Tâche, Richebourg, Grands Echezeaux, Echezeaux, and Romanée Saint Vivant. Each wine comes from a specific vineyard parcel and is made in small quantities. This scarcity is one reason for the high prices.

Collectors and investors continue to show strong interest in DRC wines. Auction houses and specialist retailers report steady demand for both recent releases and older vintages. Bottles from the 1980s and 1990s are still available on the market, with prices reflecting their rarity and condition. For example, a 1988 Richebourg is listed at €3,500 and a 1983 La Tâche at €3,495.83.

The reputation of Domaine de la Romanée-Conti is built on centuries of winemaking tradition. The estate has maintained strict control over its vineyards and production methods. Only grapes grown on its own land are used for its wines. Harvesting is done by hand and yields are kept low to ensure concentration and complexity.

Wine critics often praise DRC wines for their balance, depth of flavor, and aging potential. Many bottles are considered collectible items rather than everyday drinking wines. Some buyers purchase them as investments or to mark special occasions.

The market for fine wine has grown in recent years, with more buyers from Asia and North America entering the scene. This has contributed to rising prices for top Burgundy producers like DRC. Retailers such as SoDivin in Aigues Vives, France specialize in sourcing rare bottles for collectors around the world.

Despite high prices, demand shows no sign of slowing down. For many wine enthusiasts and collectors, owning a bottle from Domaine de la Romanée-Conti remains a symbol of prestige and passion for fine wine.
